Santa Fe Studios and Violet Crown Cinema Announce “Modern Era of Santa Fe Film” December 7-13, 2015

7 night event to celebrate and spotlight the significant Santa Fe film production legacy generated within the region in recent decades

November 25, 2015 – Santa Fe, New Mexico - Today it was announced by Santa Fe Studios and Violet Crown Santa Fe that they will present “Modern Era in Santa Fe Film” December 7-13, 2015 at the newly-opened Violet Crown Cinema at the Railyard in downtown Santa Fe.

“The international film industry has known of the rare and singularly unique cultural, historical and natural beauty of the Santa Fe region for decades,” stated Jason Hool, president of Santa Fe Studios. “We believe that this deep library of Santa Fe film production – that is both remarkable for its depth of style, broadness of genre and award-winning bragging rights – should be shown and shared with Santa Feans. And we couldn’t think of a better partner and place to do this than with Santa Fe’s stylish and modern new theatre recently opened at the Railyard District.”

Beginning on December 7 through December 13, Modern Era of Santa Fe Film will present a locally developed and produced film each evening. Each night will also feature a brief discussion about the film’s production with individuals intimately involved with the creation of that evening’s film – giving film goers the opportunity to interact and hear about the special behind the scenes stories with those involved with the production.

Lastly, before the main feature screening begins each night, the audience will be treated to the Thomas Edison short (29 seconds long), “Indian Day School”, filmed in 1897. Hool added, “Santa Feans may not know of this remarkable ‘short’ – the first known film made in New Mexico. We thought it deserved to be a part of this modern era film screening to clearly mark where our film history began.”

“The film collection that has been created in Santa Fe and the region is something that we are proud to showcase at Violet Crown,” said David Gil, Marketing Director of Violet Crown Cinemas.
